DARTMOOR

Dartmoor, one of the last great wildernesses of southern England, is a 365 square mile bleak granite upland with an average elevation of 366 m (1,200 ft), designated a National Park in 1951. It is characterized by its coarse granite outcrops, or tors, and by large areas of isolated blanket peat bog covered with purple gorse and heather which provide rough grazing for the semi-wild Dartmoor ponies. The rapidly changing weather conditions, frequently with low cloud, heavy rain and fog, provided the setting for Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's novel 'The Hound of the Baskervilles'. The heart of the moorland is crossed by only two significant roads meeting at Two Bridges, near Princetown the only town of any size. Located here is the infamous prison built in 1806. Remains of mining can be found at the Vitrifer Tin Mine and the W century, the largest quarries were at Haytor and Foggintor (where stone for Nelson's Column in London was quarried). The moor was extensively farmed in the Bronze Age when the climate was milder, and is covered in prehistoric remains such as the M Butterdon Stone Row. The moor has many medieval stone clapper bridges, examples being at Postbridge, Believer and Dartmeet. The warning signs), has the two highest points of High Willhays at 621 m (2,038 ft) and Yes Tor at 619 m (2,030 ft). Other tors to the west
